Hi [firstname],

Outer space has been at the forefront of the news cycle for over a year now. NASA's Mars rover, Perseverance, made landfall last February. Jeff Bezos went to the edge of space and back in July. A probe entered the Sun's atmosphere for the first time this past December.

We're living through an era of bold exploration and new discovery. Yet with the tragic events currently unfolding in Ukraine, experts are focused on one of the most critically important areas in space tech: satellites.

It's never been more apparent that governments worldwide need advanced, on-demand surveillance imagery in order to anticipate and prevent national security threats. In order to have that - according to the U.S. Space Development Agency - there may be 50,000 satellites in orbit in the next 10 years.

Last week, we hosted a webinar with three of the top experts in space tech: Cody Willard, a hedge fund manager with investments in multiple space companies; Marc Bell, co-founder and CEO of Terran Orbital; and General Roger Teague, an Air Force Space Command veteran who now acts as CEO of PredaSAR, a Terran Orbital corporation.

Watch Marc Bell discuss the use of SAR technology and its potential impact in Ukraine as well as how it's utilized for surveillance and decision-making here.

Check out these other quick clips from the webinar:

- Marc Bell on what it takes to build new satellites
- Marc Bell on manufacturing satellites in house + supply chain impact

Related, Terran Orbital and Tailwind Two (TWNT) announced yesterday that Terran Orbital's wholly owned subsidiary, Tyvak Nano Satellite Systems, Inc., was awarded a contract by Lockheed Martin to build 42 satellites for the Space Development Agency's Tranche 1 Transport Layer, the Initial Warfighting Capability Tranche of the National Defense Space Architecture (NDSA).
